Diagnosis and Treatment of Tooth Developmental Disturbances

Normal tooth development is a very complicated process where members of different cellular systems have to timely interact. It is obvious that such processes may go wrong caused by genetic defects such as amelogenesis and dentinogenesis imperfecta or acquired damage by chemotherapy, irradiation or traumas affecting the primary dentition and transmitted to permanent successors. An esthetically compromised dentition may have serious psychosocial implications which will be described. A group of internationally known specialists in pedodontic, orthodontic and prosthetic dentistry will go through the frequently very extensive and complicated treatment procedures.

18th - 19th May 2018

6th Copenhagen Trauma Symposium

My trauma treatment failed - why and what do I do?

It has been a general experience that quite many trauma treatments fail leading to premature tooth loss. A series of studies has analyzed the reasons for these failures and shown that many of these can be avoided. In this symposium treatment failures will be described in detail by an international panel of lecturers involved in dental traumatology. Ways to avoid immediate treatment failures will be presented as well as methods to deal with complications when they have actually occurred.
